

FACING A GIANT

By Olympic Champion Ben Peterson

When I was introduced to wrestling in junior high and high school I heard right away about the heavyweights. Heavyweight Les Loverude was the first in a long line of Cumberland, Wisconsin High School wrestlers to advance to State competition. He did so twice. I remember hearing my older brother Phil speak of the confidence he gained just by holding his own with Les, though he was younger and 50 pounds lighter. Phil later also competed at State. Then as I grew into high school I began training with our heavyweight. Ricky Chartraw was shorter than me but much heavier and much stronger. There was always the challenge to protect myself as moves were attempted. That was a good warm up for what was going to come my way in college.

Facing the “Gentle Giant” by the name of Chris Taylor was a whole new ball game for me. (You can read the complete story of Chris in the book called “The Gentle Giant” by Lynn Moore & Harold Nichols.) When people hear of Chris Taylor’s size – 6’5” and 425#, they often remark, “You didn’t wrestle him, did you?” My answer has most often been, “Of course! Who else was going to train with him?” I was the next weight class down (190 pound class) and besides, I was a team captain. If I made excuses, so would all the rest of the team.

The first reaction, and rightfully so, is to run in fear from a giant of a man like that. His power petrified me. His weight could smother you. The feeling of helplessness is never comfortable to a wrestler. It was easy to say “it is impossible to ever stay on the mat with him.”

However, once I got past the fear I learned 2 things that were most helpful.

- 1.) Chris was a gentleman and my teammate. He didn’t want to hurt me. He wanted to learn and improve also.
- 2.) Deflect power and weight. Patience, foresight and position were key to avoiding the dangerous situations. A bullfighter never charges the bull. He deflects the bull’s charge each time.

My recommendation is to wrestle some with men much bigger than you. Take your time in doing so. As you begin to handle people your own size, move up the line-up. Always stay alert to protect yourself. Take your time. Don’t do it all at once. Study and watch what the bigger man does. If he is given to charging you or spurts of frustration you must deflect and keep a distance. Never, never, never leave yourself unprotected. But if you do get vulnerable and get caught swallow your pride and plead for mercy. Then start over and be more careful.

If you think the sport of wrestling is all power and guts, beware. Someone is coming with more power and determination than you. Position is key. Use your power, use your gutsy determination, but learn to use them in the best positions. This is learned by trial and error, over and over and over. There is nothing like learning position and how to deflect power while wrestling someone much bigger than you.

I also had the good fortune of wrestling with someone much smaller than me. Dan Gable was 40-50 pounds lighter. For most of 4 years we wrestled hard with each other several times a week. Dan taught me how to deflect power again and again as he repeatedly protected himself and then attacked from another angle. He seldom fought my weight and power head-on. He was always deflecting it. That was so important for me to experience as the heavier and stronger man. As time went on I learned to tie up his speed. This, too, is an essential element of a champion. Sooner or later, most everyone faces someone faster than themselves. You must slow down and tie up your opponent's speed. Heavyweights must learn this and where better than by wrestling the lighter men on their team even though those lighter men may often seem like pesky flies.

Please take your time. Don't hurry into training with someone much different in size. But as your patience, understanding and position grow you will learn some great wrestling skills. In the end you could build some great friendships, too. Chris Taylor and Dan Gable became great friends of mine. I must also say, I would not have won the NCAA's without Gable and then the Olympics without Chris Taylor. Training with them were key elements in getting to a whole new level of competition.

In the story of David and Goliath, David didn't charge Goliath. He threw a stone before he got the angle and Goliath's sword. In the end, he finished the job with the giant's own sword. You can read about this in the Bible in I Samuel 17. David learned not to fear the big guy. Yet he was wise about how he approached him. He respected Goliath's size and strength but he also knew how to make the giant vulnerable.

David was confident that God could use what he had repeatedly practiced as a boy, his sling shot. If you faithfully prepare and practice a plan of attack you can defeat the giants you face both on and off the mat. Don't make excuses or run in fear of defeat or injury. Be wise, be patient and be tactful.

You, too, can learn to use your opponent's strengths against him. But you will need to be patient and watch repeatedly for the moment of weakness and vulnerability.

Take the challenge! Wrestle a giant! Not with reckless abandon but with planned, careful stalking. Always leave a way out. Always protect yourself. Protection is first. Deflect the power. Get angles and then advance at the right moment. There is nothing that builds confidence quite like defeating a giant!
